On the basis of a sample of 727 online participants, we test this assumption with a multiple-behavioral-measure version of a task originally devised for rats. Participants first observed videos of actors performing a variety of successful and failed learning trials in a fictive learning task. Following that, they had to perform the same or similar learning trials themselves. Successful participant-actors performed more quickly and better than chance. Moreover, viewing a learning trial that failed for an observer was associated with improved performance in the participants' next trial. These findings suggest that observing others' successful behaviour facilitates human learning
