key. Copper-dependent formation of adducts of low molecular weight aryl nitriles with cytochrome c. Aryl nitriles have been shown to be carcinogenic in a variety of animal models, and recent studies indicate that they can readily form adducts with biological macromolecules. Nitriles can form covalent adducts with cellular macromolecules through a mechanism initiated by the generation of free radicals. Heme proteins are particularly susceptible to oxidative damage and may be a target for nitriles. It was shown that cytochrome c is very susceptible to the oxidative attack of a variety of nitriles, and a copper-dependent formation of nitriles with cytochrome c was observed. The adducts were characterized by polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis and mass spectrometry.
The adducts were formed only when cytochrome c was present. Although there was no difference in the copper content of the two cytochrome c forms, the location of the reactive copper was altered from the native cytochrome to cytochrome with the adduct. Cytochrome c reacts with nitriles exclusively at the methionine-75 side chain and exhibits only one isomeric form of the copper-nitrile adducts. The metal-nitrile reaction proceeds through a copper-mediated step with formation of a free radical, while the methionine methylation reaction requires the participation of a copper-oxyl free radical species. It is suggested that cytochrome c may serve as an important target for a
